

Journal of the AHVMA Conflict of Interest Policy

The credibility of published articles depends in part on how well conflict of interest is handled by the author, reviewer, or editor. Conflict of interest exists when there is a financial or personal relationship that can inappropriately bias their actions through other commitments, or competing loyalties or interests. Such relationships vary from negligible to those with great potential to influence one's judgment. They may influence an individual's scientific judgment whether or not that person believes that it may do so. Financial relationships are the most easily identified, but other conflicts can also be influential—especially personal relationships, academic or business competition, and passion on a particular subject. For this reason, the Journal requires disclosure of all potential conflicts of interest by the authors of an article. The editor will direct articles for review to people judged least likely to have a conflict of interest. If an article seems blatantly biased, the editor and the AHVMA reserve the right to reject it for inappropriate content, or to require revision to a less biased version.
